In the U.S., where Kinect was first launched, very few people have one in their home. It is possible that the technological demands of capturing the physical movements of a trained professional, the movement and reaction of another human being, may make it unrealistic for Kinect to ever work correctly in the home. On the other hand, the NBA 2K series has used motion capture data from real-life players and had shown that the market can support it. This quote from the article, “After a full season of play-testing in which thousands of human test subjects scored gameplay improvements, the 2K team decided to share the recipe for the game, but with a big asterisk.” However, they also recognize the need for their fans to understand there are significant challenges inherent in developing a character for football. “With FIFA we were concerned that people would see the step and think about the step, and think about the footwork, and forget about the ball. The other problem is that the step might have to be the single most important thing for the game. So that is why we went back to six dribbles as a default position. ... There are things that are good about human movement, which is the fluidity. There are things that are bad about human movement, which is repetition. And there are things that you try to get out of motion-capture athletes, which is repetition.” This quote is another hint that’s it might be possible that “repetition” (like with the kicking animation) could be addressed with the motion capture. “The world of football is very complex, but it turns out that thinking about human movement, thinking about the consequences of the step, and thinking about what we can do to remove repetition in the animations can have a real effect. So on the first two games I played it on, there were things that were very human-sounding that were actually very tedious. And then on the third one, which I played a few months ago, we started to notice that was much more fluid. It had less repetition, so I made some refinements and we played a four-hour game that day and I got an MVP.” “The World Cup is the end-all, be-all. It is a million-to-one shot at the very top level of the game, and to be the best is the ultimate goal. But the road to the World Cup

Q: Generating a dictionary/hash for many clients in a server application I have a few client applications that perform the same request upon a single url. The requests should not be pooled, so I'm not sure how to deal with the issue of a timeout and/or "client session" variable. I would like the request to be "named" with a unique identifier, so that I can later know the time it was performed (
